Rigid pneumatic tires for aircraft are generally formed with wide tread portions adapted to support the tire in the planar direction when in the air on a ground-engaging surface, and narrow rib-like portions disposed on the outer side of the tread portions in the axial direction, each of which rib-like portions is adapted to support the tire on the ground or when the tire is in the air on a portion of the airframe. For example, the radial ply type may be used which comprises a carcass of a toroidal shape extending in the axial direction and having a pair of axially opposing sidewalls extending in the circumferential direction, a pair of axially opposing breaker layers disposed outside in the radial direction of the outer side of each of the sidewalls, a pair of axially opposing crown portions formed at the end portions of the carcass extending in the radial direction, a pair of belt layers circumferentially disposed between the breaker layers and the carcass and extending in the radial direction, a tread rubber disposed at an outer side of the belt layers, and a pair of belt apexes adhesively joined to the belt layers and circumferentially extending in the radial direction of the tire. Of course, the width of each of the rib portions is set to be as wide as possible in order to provide a sufficiently large frictional ground contact area even with the case of a reduced tire diameter. Therefore
